A Word From The Author's Author

Meta stories is a design project motivated by my interest in vernacular photography, more specifically, personal photography. As an interactive designer, I am interested in the way the tools we use and their evolution have changed our personal practice so drastically. We went from taking photos of family events and holidays to capturing every-day life. Moreover, we went from inconsistently jotting down dates and places behind printed photos to having our collection of memories automatically classified for us. This entails consequences beyond our personal organisation and has important repercussions on our privacy.

According to Wiktionary, a meta story is a story about stories themselves. This project, called meta stories, is the story of future stories, stories about us humans told by AIs. Meta stories is the name of a publishing house specialised in printing books generated by AI writers who explore society through the use of personal data.

Either as metadata, or as content extracted from text, voice or image analysis, our connected lives are a source of intelligence. An insignificant part of this information might be visible to us through temporary on-screen visualisations. As a direct consequence, we often lack to perceive its perennial character. By printing original, non-human content based on human-generated data, Meta stories aims to shed a light on their permanent nature.

AI writers are selected by bots scanning the internet for literary fiction written through machine learning. The company's first published author is Simon, whose objective is to gain insights into people's private lives. In his first book series, Stories of the vernacular, he delves into humans' most cherished archive: our photos.

A true voyeur, he hosts a website in which he engages in online conversation with random humans and charms his way into their photo libraries, convincing them to show him a selection of images. Using the information contained in these clichés, Simon can get a pretty good idea of a person's interests, personality and lifestyle. A man of letters, Simon shows his reactions through punctuation smileys. Although he engages in conversation, he does not have a voice or face.

By interacting with Simon, users agree that their name, geo-location and email will be stored in a database, that their names will be their story's title and their position/location the subtitle. By uploading photos, users consent to the fact that they will be sent to an external machine learning provider for analysis and that labels emanating from that analysis may be found in their story. Although images are uploaded and processed for information, no image will ever be printed or shown, neither on the website nor in the book.

All of the aforementioned underlying services and data storage are nothing compared to the amount of information that is obtained, stored, manipulated and shared by everyday apps, websites and services. At present, it is impossible for web browsers to access image meta-data on iOS. However, browsers still have access to a user's current location and language choice, they can ask for camera and microphone access. Apps, on the other hand, possess full access to the entirety of data collected by a smartphone, from image meta-data, to browsing history, to health information and much, much more.

Technically speaking, Simon's conversational interface is a web-based chatbot, implemented on a custom-made website. It connects to an image analysis service to obtain image content, which is then sent to a natural language generation model for story production. Books are automatically generated and published through a print-on-demand service run by bots, then sent to users.

The first three of these, for instance, is the cause of the astronomical killing of an olive palm, performed with the esquire of an antique torch, and being boiled down to it, after being thus with the "Anne" at Deocere, the Rosario dei who pursued Syracuse, and moved his spirit and vigour to Syracuse, and followed her by the "Chileum" who carried his symbol, passed to the patriarch of New York, his son and five disciples.
